SOURCE A

The time has come when I must place on record my belief that the attack by our navy on the Dardanelles Forts without help from our army is doomed to failure and risks disaster. I have always said that the North Sea is where we should use our fleet; since it is only there that the enemy can hurt us. For this reason I have been very concerned to see more of our navy being sent to the Dardanelles. We cannot afford to risk losing any more ships there, since these ships are our reserve in case of disaster.

For the above reasons I cannot support any further attempt to pass the Dardanelles until the shores have been occupied. Any naval action without the help of the British Army will lead to heavy loss of ships and men, with little chance of success.

From a letter by Admiral Sir John Fisher to Winston Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, May 1915. Fisher resigned as head of the navy on the same day.
A German postcard published in 1916. It shows the losses in tons of each navy in the Battle of Jutland. German losses are at the top, and British at the bottom.
A German poster published in 1918. The words say 'There is enough aluminium, copper, brass, nickel in the country! Hand it over – the army needs it!'
