Unit 3: Modern World Source Enquiry
Option 3B: War and the transformation of British society, c1931–51
Historical Enquiry: Labour in power, 1945–51

Source A: From an interview with Mrs Clare Bond in 1985, for a history of Britain called Now the War is Over. She describes the introduction of the National Health Service (NHS) in 1948.

My mother and father had been having problems with their teeth for ages, and I think they were the first at the dentist, as soon as it opened. They thought it was wonderful. My sister was at the optician as soon as it opened. She got marvellous NHS spectacles. My other sister had her first baby before the NHS and she had to pay for a midwife. Just after the NHS started, she had a second baby at home. She thought it was absolutely wonderful because, apart from having a free midwife, she had a nurse come in every day.

Source B: A cartoon published in a national newspaper, 22 December 1948, with the title ‘A Santa Claus Service’. It is a representation of the National Health Service.
Source C: From the autobiography of Clement Attlee, As It Happened, published in 1954. Attlee was the leader of the Labour Party and here he is writing about the General Election of 1945.

I think, first of all, people wanted a positive new policy, which we had, and not an attempt to go back to the old policies of the Conservatives. Even those who would have liked Churchill as prime minister, weren’t prepared to have him if it meant having the Conservatives too. They remembered the unemployment of the 1930s. They didn’t want the Conservatives.

Source D: A photograph showing Aneurin Bevan, the Minister of Health, visiting Sylvia Beckingham, on 5 July 1948 at Park Hospital, Manchester. Sylvia was the first ever National Health Service hospital patient. This photograph was published in a number of newspapers.

Source E: From an interview with a doctor for a pamphlet Meet Yourself at the Doctor’s. It was produced in 1949 by Mass Observation, a research organisation which aimed to record everyday life in Britain.

I hated having to send out those awful bills to patients before the NHS. There seem to be far more women patients than there used to be, before the NHS. I think the main reason is that, before, many women simply wouldn’t see a doctor unless they were seriously ill, largely because of the expense. Now that they have the NHS, they tend to visit the doctor as soon as possible. It may mean more immediate work for the doctor. However, in many cases it prevents serious conditions developing which would eventually need far more treatment.
There was strong support for the National Health Act, which was introduced by Bevan in 1946. It was popular with most people, especially women, because it promised universal, free medical treatment. By 5 July 1948, three-quarters of the population had registered with the NHS. However, it faced powerful opposition from the medical profession, especially doctors represented by the British Medical Association (BMA). The BMA thought that doctors would lose money as a result of the NHS because they feared there would be no private patients. In addition, there was criticism of the high cost of the NHS.
