Section A

Answer Question 01.

Source A

From a letter sent by a member of the National Guard to a friend in Rennes, describing the events of 10 August 1792.

Paris – 11 August 1792
We are all tired out. Hardly had we reached the garden of the Tuileries, than we heard the alarm cannon. More than 20 000 marched across Paris, bristling with pikes and bayonets. The people flung bitter reproaches at the King and accused him of being the author of his troubles. The Swiss Guards, who treacherously fired on the crowds, were cut to pieces. Those taken prisoner had their brains blown out; traitors sacrificed with vengeance. It appears that the coup has prevented one by the aristocracy. The Swiss Guards had hoped for support, but the rich men dared not put in an appearance.

Source B

From an article recalling the events of 10 August 1792, published in the British newspaper, ‘The Times’. It was provided for the paper by a Frenchman who regularly contributed news.

16 August 1792
I write you a full account of the most tragic event that ever my eyes witnessed. It is such as makes humanity shudder and my blood freezes with horror at the very recollection of the massacre to which I was an unwilling spectator. The outrages were the result of cool, deliberate and premeditated action. A guard from Marseilles demanded entrance from the commanding Swiss officer at the Palace. When the Swiss said orders prevented him from complying, the officer shot him through the heart. That moment the carnage began. The mobs called for the dethronement of the King and, not content with having murdered all those within the Palace, they used cannon to beat down the walls.

With reference to these sources and your understanding of the historical context, which of these two sources is more valuable in explaining the events of 10 August 1792?
